HOW OFTEN HAVE YOU WISHED YOU HAD A HIGH SCHOOL DIPLOMA?

It happens every day: An employer will not give you a job because you don't have a high school education. You're passed over for a job promotion because you don't have the necessary high school training. Your friends are inclined to feel superior because they graduated from high school and you didn't.

In each instance a high school diploma could have made the difference.

That "difference" is why so many thousands of people—regardless of their reasons for dropping out of school—have turned to International Correspondence Schools. I.C.S. is the world's oldest and largest home-study school. The I.C.S. High School Diploma is recognized and respected the world over.

You can earn an I.C.S. High School Diploma in the privacy of your own home—in your spare time—at your own pace. You take only the subjects you need from the complete schedule of I.C.S. Courses. And, best of all, you'll receive personalized guidance and instruction along every step of the way.

With I.C.S., everything you learn is practical and down-to-earth. There are no extra "trimmings" to interfere with goals you want to accomplish. Proof of results comes from the success achieved by so many former I.C.S. students.

Just to show you how easy it is, I.C.S. will send you FREE a valuable Career Kit with 3 famous booklets that have helped others like yourself: (1) "How to Succeed" Career Guide, (2) a High School Catalog, and (3) a Sample Lesson to demonstrate this famous method.

So if you've ever wished you had a high school diploma—if you've ever felt you were being held back in your job and social life because of a lack of high school training—mark and mail the coupon today.

There is absolutely no obligation.

JUSTICE and not REVENGE

You just couldn't help noticing the rider on the brown stallion. He was walking his horse through the Main Street of Charberg. The reins were hardly being held at all in his left hand. Definitely he was young. Not more than twenty one or two at the most. But it was his face that held your attention. An old face with the lines of suffering that can wither any human being.

"Something familiar about him," remarked Jed Glaser as he stood outside of his barber shop.

"I got the feeling I seen him before," acknowledged Lou Adels, the deputy sheriff of Charberg.

The horse stopped before the railing outside of the town's one and only hotel. The rider dismounted. He tied the reins to the hitching post and then took his saddle bags off his horse. He walked inside and faced the desk clerk.

"I want a room. Maybe for a week. Maybe longer. Also a hot bath as soon as possible."

He didn't ask if they had a bathtub. Either he knew or assumed that this item of luxury on the frontier existed.

"A dollar a day for the room and fifty cents for the bath," replied the desk clerk. "I can have one of the men take your horse to Morgan's Livery Stable."

The stranger signed his name to the register. He paid a week's rent in advance and also for the bath. He was given the key to room 19 on the second floor. A few minutes later the deputy sheriff entered and took a quick glance at the register. His face betrayed his surprise.

"You better read the name," he told the desk clerk. "Means we're going to have some real trouble soon in town."

Then he turned around and hurried back to the office. Sheriff Sam Dudley was reading some wanted notices when his deputy came in with the news.

"Dave Simpson's son is alive. Frank just rode into town. He's staying at the hotel. Should I ride out to the ranch and warn Mr. Hooper?"

"Not a bad idea," agreed the sheriff. "I think I will pay Frank a visit. Like somebody comes home from the graveyard. Why did he wait until now to show up? Five years is a long time. He will want to avenge the killing of his family. Wonder how I am going to stop him?"

The sheriff buckled on his gun belt and slowly walked across the street to the hotel. He could see a small groups of men talking to the hotel clerk. As he mounted the steps one of the men spoke.

"Just doesn't seem possible that Dave's son is alive. What are you going to do about it?"

"He didn't commit any crime," snapped back the sheriff "Remember? It was the killers of his family that are the criminals we want."

The sheriff waited until the clerk checked and found that Frank had finished his bath. Then he went upstairs and knocked on the door.

"Come in," said a familiar voice.

The door was opened and the sheriff found himself facing a six gun in the hand of young Frank Simpson.

"Sorry," apologized the youth as he replaced the gun into the holster which was on a small table. "Just can't afford to take any chances."

"I understand," replied the sheriff. "Now that you are back what do you intend to do?"

"Right after breakfast tomorrow morning I ride out to the Bar-L ranch to see Walter Hooper. I want my land back. I assume you already sent your deputy to warn him of my arrival. Also that you want to come with me. So let's have breakfast together."

When you read a man's thoughts and anticipate his actions then you are his master. There was something amounting to futility on the sheriff's face. He wanted to talk about not having any violence. Instead he found himself saying he would have breakfast at nine with Frank.

It was a clear windless day and Walter Hooper was standing outside his ranch house. He had ordered his men to stay away.

"But there may be trouble," protested Slim Leghorn, his foreman. "What concerns you puts me right in the middle of it also. They figured we did the killing. Were it not for the alibi Judge O'Reilly gave us I think we would never have had a chance against that mob."

"But we didn't do the killing," insisted Walter Hooper. "I never will rest until it is cleared up. As long as I live it will be over me with the finger of suspicion pointed at me."

The foreman walked to the bunk house. Walter Hooper suddenly found his daughter Ethel at his side.

"I thought I told you to remain inside," he half scolded her.

"If you have nothing to worry about yourself," she replied, "Then there's nothing to worry about me. On the other hand, if there is going to be trouble I want to be here. Five years is a long time. Then I thought I loved Frank. We would talk about our plans for the future."

"And I ruined everything?" sighed her father. "They say a man is sometimes punished just because he has thought evil. I wanted that land so desperately. It had the only well on it with enough water to take care of my herd. Without the water I was broke. And Dave refused to either sell me the land or let me use the well. Said I deserved it because of the way I had been treating the homesteaders.

"I actually thought of having the Simpson family wiped out. That is how desperate I was. But no, I felt I would have to face ruin rather than do such a terrible thing. And then they were all killed. All except Frank who vanished."

"You are innocent?" challenged his daughter.

"As God is my maker," repeated her father. "I tell you what I have said before. I am blameless. I still can't figure out who killed them. And why!"

Two figures on horseback grew larger and larger. Ten minutes later the two riders dismounted before the ranch. Frank faced young Ethel and there was a smile on his face.

"Just as pretty as ever."

That broke the tension and the four of them entered the ranch house. Then Frank turned to her father.

"I want my land back."

"I never took it," explained her father. "Three days after the tragedy we got a rainy spell and all the water we needed to save my herd. However I have paid the taxes on it these past five years and in your name."

There was more that Walter Hooper wanted to say. But to what avail? If Frank felt he was the killer there definitely was nothing he could say to disprove it. He shook his head sadly. Life has a way of catching up with you. He was among those who always felt the boy was still alive, and would one day return to even up the score.

"Have you any plans for the future?" asked Ethel.

"That depends," was his reply. He didn't finish it because the hoofbeats of a horse could be clearly heard. The four went outsdoors again in time to see the deputy jump from his horse. He had important news to tell.

"They got the killer of Frank's family," he announced. "Marshal Wilbertson and three of his men rode into town. There was some shooting. But the banker made a complete confession before he died."

"I can tell you what he said," interrupted Frank as he faced Ethel. "Everyone including myself thought your father was the only man with a motive. I had gone outside of the house to the well to get some water. All the family was on the porch. The shooting broke out so quickly I was dazed. I then ran away. What else could I do? I figured whoever had killed my family would get me also. Then they burned the house down.

I managed to get to Denver. There was a man by the name of Burt Livingston my father once mentioned. A good friend of my father. But he wasn't there. So I drifted from one job to another. Always with the idea of getting revenge. Then half a year ago I met Burt Livingston. Know who he is? Owner of the famous Silvertown Mine. I learned he had given my father thirty thousand dollars because my father had once grubbed staked him. This was to be a surprise to the family. My father gave the money to the banker who was facing ruin. If he could only keep the money. He and a hired killer did the shooting. It looked so simple to put the blame on your father, except for the alibi the judge gave him.

Mr. Livingston hired the best detectives. They traced the money and got the evidence on the banker. So Justice finally has won. Now for my plans? I will stay around and call on you again if I may."

"You may," replied a very happy girl. "Now let's taste some of the apple pie I made."

THE END
